Identification of a novel RING finger ubiquitin E3 ligase involved in IPP2 degradation. Identifying novel proteins that are responsible for ubiquitin E3 ligase-mediated proteasomal degradation is one of the most challenging research problems in the field of molecular physiology. Analyses of mammalian ubiquitin E3 ligases have revealed that RING finger-containing proteins are the most abundant. However, the E3 ligases mediating turnover of specific proteins are still largely unknown. Using yeast two-hybrid screening of a human brain cDNA library, we identified a novel RING finger protein, DPY19L2, which mediates the proteasomal degradation of a human inositol polyphosphate-5-phosphatase, IPP2. The DPY19L2 protein contains a canonical C3HC4 RING finger motif and an N-terminal coiled-coil domain. We further demonstrated that the DPY19L2 protein acts in a specific manner as an ubiquitin E3 ligase by direct binding to IPP2 and interacting with the proteasomal subunit, RPN10. At the cellular level, knockdown of DPY19L2 in HEK293 cells resulted in an accumulation of IPP2 and the upregulation of IPP2-mediated conversion of phosphatidylinositol-4,5-bisphosphate to phosphatidylinositol-3,4,5-trisphosphate. These findings provide the first evidence that DPY19L2 is a specific E3 ligase for IPP2 in vivo. DPY19L2 may act as a novel regulator of IPP2-mediated membrane signaling in mammalian cells.

The dashboard camera is mounted in the windshield of the vehicle. U.S. Pat. No. 4,589,826 (GOGGIN) teaches a combined camera housing and mount. The combined camera housing and mount is mounted on a dashboard of a vehicle. The combined camera housing and mount includes a camera body into which one or more lenses are inserted. The combination is removably attached to the dashboard via a mounting bracket and lens holding bracket. U.S. Pat. No. 5,448,325 (WATTS) teaches a video camera that is mounted in a vehicle and connected to a video processor for displaying the image. The processor includes a processor case that houses the processor. The processor case includes a window through which a display screen displays the image. The window has a size and shape that is the same as or similar to a window used for a control display in the dash-board. U.S. Pat. No. 5,737,030 (BERTON) teaches a digital camera that includes a removable image sensing head and a wired or wireless video link to a personal computer. The head can be replaced by another head that has a different image sensing capability (e.g., a video camera). U.S. Pat. No. 5,742,194 (SCHICK) teaches a vehicle video camera for supporting and retaining a video imaging camera in a manner that is substantially flush with the top surface of a vehicle windshield. U.S. Pat. No. 5,828,679 (PIODA) teaches a video camera device for mounting on a vehicle. The device includes a housing for installation within a windshield of the vehicle with a lens unit mounted within the housing for external viewing. U.S. Pat.
