Q: Cassandra query performance difference between varchar and int column types I am looking for a way to improve the query performance of cassandra. I have a table with about 1 million rows and the primary key is composed of a varchar and an int. (The varchar is the product_id and the int is the product_code). The function I need to call to filter the data is WHERE code_id = 348543232. For such query cassandra will fetch all rows (about 2 seconds), while if I use `code_id` as primary key cassandra fetches about a second. Is there any difference with different column types? I would like to know if it is possible to use an int as primary key, or if I need to change the query to something like `WHERE varchar = '43232'` I have already tried using the a column type other than varchar, but it didn't help. A: If you need some kind of equality predicate, I suggest you use a composite primary key. For example, you can use int `code_id` and the string `product_code`, so your composite key has two components. Then you can use the same composite primary key in all your queries. Athletics at the 2006 Central American and Caribbean Games The athletics competition at the 2006 Central American and Caribbean Games was held in Cartagena, Colombia between 14-18 July. The event was scheduled to take place over eleven days instead of the usual ten days, with the Saturday athletics taking place on July 18, 2006, instead of July 17, 2006. The competition was a new addition to the events programme, replacing the previous Central American Games. All events were contested at the Nuevos Zócalo of the city, except for the women's pole vault and the combined event. Financial markets are trading a bevy of different stocks. Only some have access to international markets. In fact, these kinds of cross-border securities play a particularly important role in driving economic growth. How do we get to the point of all markets being able to access international markets? There are three key issues that need to be resolved. One is how the standard and

Q: Obtaining the starting position of a Shift-reversed word Given an ASCII string, how would I obtain the starting position of the first word of the string, from which the Shift key is backspaced? For example, if the string was as follows (for which the starting position of the first word would be x): 21_This_Is_A_String. You can assume that the string will not be padded, which means that consecutive spaces will be ignored. I'm aware that the ASCII code of Shift is the ASCII code of Space, but I'm not sure how to relate the two to the actual Shift key that is pressed on the keyboard. To be clear, since the string was typed by holding the Shift key, and since the Shift key on the keyboard is an upper case Space, we only need the ASCII code of a non-Shift character that is common to both the Shift and a Space. A: If you want to assume the shift key is being used as a space, then how about "A?b" instead of "A b"? This would be the most common usage, and so is a solution that will work for everyone... Otherwise, since you'll need to decide on what the "Shift" key is based on, i.e. either function key or actual shift key, it doesn't really matter to us... we could even use the shift key's ascii code... only that way the question wouldn't have been answerable for 99% of the time. Here's a C# example that searches for the starting position of the first space (shift key in this case) of a string of any text, and the number of the character before a word is defined as the starting position. I didn't include a trim of the string as it seems you're asking how to find the starting position of a word that includes spaces. (Edit: I've added trimming to the example) using

System.IO; namespace ConsoleApplication1 { class Program { public static int GetWordStart(string MyString) { int startIndex = 0; int startPosition = 0;
